International Security

June 28 – July 26, 2014

Spend four weeks in historic Oxford, England, examining a variety of different approaches to international security, including theoretical debates about security, the causes of international and civil conflict, and how individual and systemic factors influence the abundance of, or lack of, security in the international system. We will further work on broadening the conception of security by considering the non-traditional security threats like insurgencies and terrorism as well as the impact of nuclear proliferation on state security.

This course explores theoretical and historical explanations for a range of security issues in the international system. The concept of security, traditionally, is studied with respect to countries and how countries can protect themselves. However, students of international relations will quickly observe that contemporary security problems often arise from other sources of conflict and grievance, such as civil and ethnic conflict, terrorism, and environmental challenges. The focus of this class is primarily on conceptions of security in the post-Cold War world, as well as examining the causes of World War I, World War II, and other pivotal historic conflicts.

Learn outside of the classroom on group excursions:

- Imperial War Museum
- Churchill War Rooms
- Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies (RUSI), which is one of the oldest security think tanks founded in 1831 by the Duke of Wellington and which remains engaged in cutting edge defense and security research.
- Visit to Bletchley Park
- Visit to the Commonwealth Secretariat
